Polling Question #1

Does your current organization have...

- a. Human Resources
- b. Talent Acquisition
- c. HR & TA
- d. None of the Above

HR + TA = ?

- What happens when HR & TA join forces?
- What are the advantages?
- What are some disadvantages?
- Should HR & TA be separate divisions or a collaborative team?
- What if your HR team is your TA team?

We polled HR & TA Professionals... How did they respond?

HR professionals polled

“There can be blind spots/overlap between the business partners that support leaders and the TA person supporting the same leaders. If those 2 aren't in lock-step, nuanced conversations with the leader/manager that occur with one might not be relayed in "real time" to the other, causing confusion, extra work and potentially loss of confidence from the leader/manager that the two aren't collaborating efficiently.”

“When done right, there is a seamless transition from courting, interviewing, closing, on-boarding, socializing and performing. Additionally, IF led by HR, there are usually better reporting functions to help with visibility into pipeline, potential upcoming roles and nuances of team/manager that the role sits within.”

TA professionals polled

“Deep dive into each interaction and step to understand the experience on both sides, solve for experience using a holistic approach to time spent, information gathered and shared and whether that experience should lead to an easy decision to offer or join. Then continuously seek to improve the process, tools and interview quality.”

“Having more hands to help with screening and sourcing for sure is the biggest advantage. Also having an “in” with the team who creates offer letters helps.”

“Staying organized if we have more than three people working on recruiting items across different sites. Our ATS is awful and our managers, despite training, aren't great at using the tool”.

“We do quite a bit of cross training between all functions of HR so everyone understands the other functions roles and responsibilities. It also helps that we are an in office company so this is accomplished relatively easy and in real time.”
