

Leading Effective Change

To stay relevant, teams and organizations must continuously change and adapt to their ever evolving internal and external environments. This makes it imperative leaders understand and possess the skills to effectively lead change. Furthermore, it is also important that leaders know how to shape a learning culture to facilitate continuous adaptation and improvement. Leaders who can effectively lead change gain a competitive advantage for their teams and organizations.

This program will provide the participant with the knowledge and tools to effectively plan and lead change and to shape a learning culture in their organization. Although not required, participants are encouraged to bring thoughts on a challenge or project regarding an on-going or future change effort in their teams or organizations. Participants can immediately apply the tools from this workshop to enhance change management efforts.

Faculty Biography

Dr. Amy Wallis is a Full Professor of Practice in Organizational Behavior at the Wake Forest University School of Business. Since joining the School of Business in 2012, Amy has taught courses on leadership, ethics, organizational behavior, team development, and change management, and has been instrumental in advancing global immersion courses, where students experience the opportunity to study business practices around the world and travel to international locations to advance their knowledge. She is the faculty leader for the MBA global immersion course in Nicaragua, and a member of a team of faculty who have guided courses in Latin America, India, and China.

More Information

For more information on Wake Forest Executive Education, please visit our website at <https://sps.wfu.edu/executive-education/>